Gold steadies near $5,080 amid dollar strength while crude rallies sharply on escalating supply risks

Spot gold traded steady near $5,080 per ounce, recovering part of its recent losses but still heading for its first weekly decline in over a month as a stronger US dollar and rising inflation concerns weighed on sentiment. Prices briefly climbed above $5,100, though the metal remains down nearly 3% for the week. The dollar index has gained about 1.3% this week—its strongest rise since November 2024—while US Treasury yields moved to multi-week highs as markets reassessed expectations for Federal Reserve rate cuts. Escalating conflict involving the US, Israel, and Iran has driven oil prices sharply higher, raising fears of renewed inflation and prompting traders to scale back rate-cut bets to roughly 34 basis points by year-end. Despite short-term volatility and liquidity-driven selling, gold remains up nearly 20% this year. Fundamentally, persistent geopolitical risk and inflation uncertainty continue to provide a strong medium-term support base for bullion.

WTI crude oil is heading for its sharpest weekly gain since Russia’s full-scale invasion of Ukraine in February 2022, with prices rising over 4% to trade near $84.30 per barrel. The rally was triggered after the U.S. and Israel launched strikes on Iran, prompting Tehran to halt tanker movement through the Strait of Hormuz, a key corridor that carries nearly one-fifth of global oil supply. The conflict has since spread across major energy-producing regions in the Middle East, disrupting oil output and forcing the shutdown of some refineries and LNG facilities. Prices briefly eased after Washington issued waivers allowing companies, particularly Indian refiners, to purchase sanctioned Russian crude to ease supply shortages, with roughly 30 million barrels currently floating in storage. While the geopolitical premium has lifted prices sharply, the market remains sensitive to supply flows and policy responses. If disruptions around Hormuz persist, crude could sustain its upward momentum in the near term despite partial supply relief from Russian barrels.

Base metals are trading on a mixed note, with copper emerging as the lone underperformer, while aluminium and zinc are posting gains of around 1%. Aluminium prices remain firmly supported, heading for their largest weekly advance since 2024, with LME prices extending gains to over 5% for the week. The rally has been driven by escalating geopolitical tensions in the Middle East, as the ongoing US-Israeli conflict with Iran disrupted shipments through the Strait of Hormuz, a key artery for global aluminium trade. Several regional producers, including major smelters in Bahrain and Qatar, have reported delivery and production disruptions, amplifying concerns over supply from a region responsible for a significant share of global output. Meanwhile, copper faces headwinds from a stronger US dollar and rising inventories, with SHFE stockpiles climbing to a record 425,145 tons, highlighting soft demand conditions in China despite broader market volatility.

US natural gas futures climbed above $3/MMBtu on Friday, extending weekly gains as a larger-than-expected storage withdrawal tightened supply and pushed inventories further below the five-year average, indicating stronger late-winter demand. Geopolitical tensions in the Middle East, including uncertainty over restoring operations at QatarEnergy’s Ras Laffan LNG hub and the closure of the Strait of Hormuz, have heightened supply concerns. While the US administration is evaluating measures to curb energy costs, the current inventory deficit and supply risks keep the near-term fundamental outlook constructive for gas prices.
