Gold extends gains on softer dollar and rising odds of US rate cut, while Crude oil holds steady as Russian supply risks ease

Spot gold climbed nearly 1% to trade above $4,160/Oz, supported by renewed dollar weakness and rising expectations of a U.S. interest-rate cut before year-end. Dollar extended its decline for 2nd session, improving affordability for international buyers, while delayed economic data strengthened the case for December easing. Softer September retail sales and the sharpest drop in consumer confidence since April signaled cooling momentum in household spending. Rate-cut expectations were further reinforced by speculation that NEC Director Hassett—viewed as supportive of lower borrowing costs—could become the next Fed Chair. Gold continues to consolidate above the $4,000 level after pulling back from last month’s record high above $4,380. The metal remains on track for its strongest annual performance since 1979, up more than 58% YTD, driven by robust central-bank buying and sustained demand linked to currency debasement concerns.

WTI Crude Oil hovered near $58 per barrel after settling at a one-month low, pressured by renewed optimism surrounding progress in Ukrainian peace negotiations. The White House signaled that only a few issues remain unresolved, raising speculation that a potential agreement could ease restrictions on Russian crude flows in an already oversupplied market. However, despite heavy Western sanctions, Russia continues to redirect discounted barrels to China, India, and Turkey, limiting the immediate impact of any policy shift. Fundamentally, the market remains weighed down by rising global supply, with OPEC+ and non-OPEC producers ramping output and the IEA forecasting a record 4 million barrels per day surplus in 2026. API data showing a modest 1.9-million-barrel U.S. inventory draw offered little support. Overall, sentiment remains bearish as oversupply concerns overshadow geopolitical optimism.

Base metals traded mixed, with copper extending gains and holding above $10,800/ton as softer U.S. economic data reinforced expectations of a December Fed rate cut and weighed on the U.S. dollar, improving demand prospects for metals priced in the currency. Support also stemmed from Chile, where the mining authority raised its price outlook and Codelco sought significantly higher annual premiums, adding to tightening supply signals. Meanwhile, commentary from a senior Chinese industry representative highlighting halted smelting projects and pressure from ultra-low processing fees further underscored a constrained production environment.

US natural gas futures held near $4.50/MMBtu after a 5% decline to $4.40/MMBtu, pressured by record production and comfortable storage. Lower-48 output averaged 109.7 bcf/d in November, exceeding October’s 107.4 bcf/d and setting a new monthly high, keeping inventories about 5% above seasonal norms. However, demand prospects are improving as forecasts indicate below-normal temperatures through December 10. LNG exports also remain supportive, with flows from the eight major US terminals averaging 18 bcf/d in November, up from October’s record 16.6 bcf/d. Thus, ample supply caps upside, but weather-driven demand and strong LNG flows offer near-term support.
